Marquette defeated De Soto, 8 to 3, in a game of the Knights of Columbus Indoor Baseball league.

Fooling the other fellow has been almost as big an issue in determining the issue of boxing bouts as the relative physical merits of the fighters themselves.

Quick thinking, combined with ability and maybe a little unsuspected trick thrown in, have turned the tide of many a ring battle.

Some championship have even changed hands through a little trick worked by an agile-minded fighter at a critical moment.

A ruse which drew Bob Fitzsimmons into Jim Jeffries' dressing room before their Coney Island fight perhaps had as much to do with Fitzsimmons' defeat as the beating he subsequently took in the ring.

Fitz was a middleweight, and although he had never seen Jeff, friends told him of the Californian's immense physique, which brought from him the famous exclamation, "The bigger they are the harder they fall."

But when Fitz was enticed into Jeff's dressing room a short time before their bout on the pretext of arranging details of rules, there is no doubt that he was shocked at Jeff's great bulk lying, dressed for the ring, on a cot.

Fitz was a gamester and if he felt any fear he kept it to himself, but many of his friends believe that Fitz knew he was beaten before he climbed into the ring.

Jack Johnson was a crafty strategist when cornered. His knockout of Stanley Ketchell in the 12th round of their bout at Colma in 1909 was the direct result of his ability to think faster than Ketchell.

Early in the 12th round Ketchell caught Johnson on the point of the jaw, sending him down for the count of nine.

Johnson arose groggy and staggering. Ketchell, elated, with the vision of the heavyweight crown within his grasp, rushed in to end it.

Johnson met him with a terrific left to the jaw, knocking him out. Johnson had been stalling.

Fitzsimmons pulled a similar stall on Corbett in their championship fight in 1897.

One of Bat Nelson's great tricks was to rebound from the ropes after being knocked into them, surprising his opponent into an opening and combining the force of his blow with the impetus of the rebound.

A few months ago, Billy Wagner, a second-rater, almost scored a knockout over Freddie Welsh by a ruse.

"You are losing your trunks," Wagner exclaimed and Welsh dropped his guard and glanced down.

Wagner was too surprised to take full advantage of the opportunity or there would have been a new lightweight champion. As it was he staggered Welsh with a hook to the jaw.
